My scanario: You live in a place where people around you don't have any no tion of cleanliness and sanity, and you see mouses, insects sometimes even where you put your plates because of the lack of cleaning efforts in the house . Then you need a good advice and motivation to be well directed on your cleaning initiatives. Instead of going to buy cleaning books, you just want to navigate online to find any good advice. Is eco savvy site helpful? Are you satisfied ?

The first user's named Chris Hott has rated ecosavvy as a good site overall and that it goes very well to its target audience (people who like to learn about re cycling and advice). He didn't really use the senario; instead of that he mostly navi gate through the whole site to check its functionality. But at first he had a strange feeling when he was navigating the eco savvy home page: the bottom image was showing up with its link together when the mouse went accidentally on top of the gal lery box, then he concluded that the buttons were probably set all the way at the bot tom. Also some question mark came up in his mind; 'are the buttons clickable?'

Before he finally realised that it just all mousing over, and he could only click on the read more button to access other pages. Otherwise, the quiz was working for him perfectly. In addition, he checked the be savvy page, and found it great, everything was clean, well organised and motivating.

After that, he checked the green stories, and liked it .The only suggestion he made was that it would have been more informations about the calories and more details about the foods at the bottom of that page, when talking about eating healthy. Last he emailed the designer and it went through.

Other users like Matt Brady found the site helpfull and was very satisfied. He chosed to go first to the good advice page according to the senario. He clicked on the link and found out that the page had good habits, good pictures, it gives good informa tions, all that he needed. The last task was to email the author. When he filled up the informations and emailed the author, it went through. So he was satisfied because he could find what he needed. The only thing was that he had to scroll down before get ting all the informations. He found the site pretty clear and working contact page.

In conclusion, it was a good experience to have other people navigate on your own website, looking for informations and giving you feed back. That really will make us improve not only our design but also and mainly our site functionality, that is what the usability is for in general.
